British Foes of Bomb Aid Security Sabotage

LONDON, Jan. 1 (Reuters) —A nation-wide campaign aimed at disrupting Britain's state security system was started today by the ban-the-bomb Committee of 100.

Informed advice on how to obtain secret information from government departments by telephone was given in the committee's latest bulletin to supporters.

An article suggested that readers obtain secret information by impersonation. It gave four telephone numbers for would-be spies to ring. The anonymous author also told how to prevent a telephone call from being traced.

With these techniques, it told readers, "you are capable of inflicting the most amazing damage to the complicated state security system."
